Utah rates high for maintaining Pony Express trail

Second in a series

By Bruce Hills Deseret News staff writer

Utah has done an excellent job of maintaining its portion of the 124year-old Pony Express trail.

Steve Banks and I, traveling west by pickup truck and trailing a dune buggy behind, found our home state has done better than Nevada or California in identifying Pony Express stations and the route from one to the next.

In Salt Lake City, the Pony Express riders stopped at Salt Lake House, at 143 S. Main, a station built of stone, which looked much like Brigham Young's Beehive House. Horace Greeley and Mark Twain were among the guests there.

From there the trail wove south nine miles to Trader's Rest, on State Street, and then to Rockwell's, 10 miles farther south. The station was > Simpson Springs has been restored and is said to look much as it did when it was a Pony Express station. Several other stations were in Utah, and only ruins remain.

named after the operator, Orrin Porter Rockwell, who served in the 1830s as Brigham Young's bodyguard and was later appointed territorial marshal.

say, and has a museum there, The Stagecoach Museum, which is open from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. daily. Admission is 50 cents. The inn was built in 1858 by John Carson as a family home and inn and was used as a Pony Express and Overland Stage stop during the 1860s.

Simpson Springs, 43 miles west of Fairfield, has been restored and is said to look much as it did when it was a Pony Express station. Several other stations were in Utah, and only ruins remain. Plaques and signs at these locations tell their stories.

From Camp Floyd in Fairfield, west to the Nevada border, the trail moved through 15 station stops. Today the road is marked with signs, and the gravel road has a fairly good surface. One can drive 40 mph or more on most stretches.

Large stone monuments have been constructed at most of the stations, and information plaques and signs help to identify some of the stops. However, vandals have damaged many, if not most, of Utah's Pony Express monuments, and many signs along the route have disappeared.

Aside from that, the Pony Express None of these sites exists today, Trail in Utah continuously offers great help on the Pony Express trail through Utah.

Between Fairfield and the Fish Springs National Wildlife Refuge, which is on the trail about 90 miles west of Fairfield, Steve and I saw only one car on the road.

The wildlife refuge is a surprise. Imagine seeing the Bonneville Salt Flats in the northwest stretching into the distance and sage brush and sand on both sides of the Pony Express route, and then suddenly seeing water flowing in streams along the trail.

The water comes from natural springs and flows into lakes at the wildlife refuge, which is host for a variety of water birds and muskrats, skunks and coyotes.

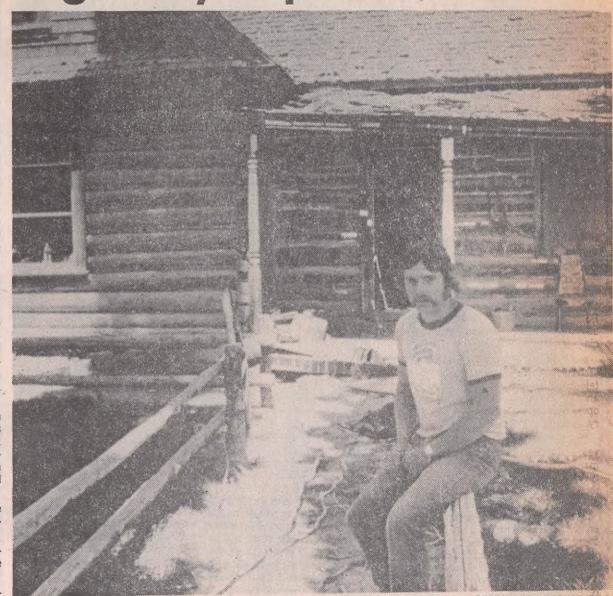

Twenty-five miles west lies Callao, a tiny village of log and frame homes. There are no stores or services in Callao. BLM employee Decker says there used to be a farmer there who had a gasoline pump in his yard and would sell gas to tourists. "but he tore the pump down when gas prices jumped so high a few years ago."

Raymond Timm, 25, who lives in Callao in a log home built decades ago, says his ancestors used to sell wood, hay and grain to the Pony Express station at Willow Springs a half mile west of Callao, and to Boyd Station, eight miles east of Callao.

"I had an ancestor named George Boyd who worked at the express station." Timm said.

Today, Timm and his brother Dennis grow 150 acres of hay and raise 100 cattle on their farm.

Life is peaceful and quiet in Callao, Timm says. "We have only had

PHOTOGRAPHY/ BRUCE HILLS

"After the mall idea was defunct," Sloan said, "we felt safe. Stan (Smedley) even told me once we could possibly be sold out from under him.

elped city, hurt 2 firms

The RDA was of little help, even though they sent a be there for the next nine years."

letter offering assistance, Sloan said. He added he doesn't remember any offers of loans or grants from the RDA.

Smedley said he may have told Sloan the city had no

"I would have jumped at something like that," he said.

plans for the property, because that was true until February, when Shipley became interested.

"But I never said anything about nine years. From the time (Sloan) came in, we told him the land was under Sloan said his Layton location is operating better than expected, but said he still has serious financial problems.

His savings of $1,800 was used to move from Bountiful;

his wife recently gave birth to twins just after his medical insurance company canceled his policy, and Smedley contract and his lease could be terminated at any time."

From Ibapah the Pony Express route winds through the Goshute Indian Reservation to the Nevada borsome places hardly a trail at all. trail is just that - a trail - and if Next: The trail through Nevada ther, Pappy Payne, ran the store. He is from Gold Hill, six miles away - a dozen residents. ghost town now with less than half a

For the next 150 miles through eastern Nevada, the Pony Express

GEL, GOOD TIAL TIAL

available there, but Callao residents

There is only one phone in Ibapah say they seldom go to Ibapah.

at the Goshute General Store, owned store five years. Before that, her faand operated by Jim and Kay Hill. Mrs. Hill said she has operated the about 30 miles farther west near the Delta, 90 miles to the southeast, or in buy their gasoline and groceries in Goshute Indian Reservation on the are two stores in Ibapah, a town Utah-Nevada border, and gasoline is Wendover, 80 miles northwest. There People who live in Callao say they cal Perspective," published in 1979, Express Stations of Utah in Histori-Land Management office in Salt from Lowell Decker of the Bureau of Lake City before our trip. It was of I had obtained a book, "The Pony cool green forests and mountains. flats and expanses of sagebrush to a variety of terrain, from desert salt

no rerebnouses

day much as it did in 1860, historians Camp Floyd in Fairfield looks to-

"If I lose in court, that will probably force me out of

The demise of 4th Street Games was slightly different, the result of a city ordinance prohibiting more than four here in Bountiful."

"Somebody should have taken responsibility," he said. business . . . and we were just starting to make money

Sloan said he feels no one was completely honest with has sued him for two months of back rent.

can the traveler observe a station -Not until the next stop, Fairfield, where in 1860 a small grocery store miles southwest of Rockwell's, served travelers and soldiers from a